Viriconium is a series of novels and stories written by M. John Harrison between 1971 and 1984, set in and around the fictional city of the same name. In the first novel in the series, the city of Viriconium exists in a future Earth littered with the technological detritus of millennia (partly inspired by Jack Vance 's Dying Earth series, Mervyn Peake 's Gormenghast series [1] and the poems of ...

Viriconium - Wikipedia

John Harrison marshals an arsenal of arcane vocabulary to describe the fetid desuetude of the world of his mythical city of Viriconium. In a handful of stories written over the span of more than a decade, starting in 1971, he traces the fractured, half-remembered rise and fall of the eponymous imagined future city, founded many millennia after the demise of our own civilization.

Viriconium Series by M. John Harrison - Goodreads

And so we come to the end of M. John Harrison's trilogy of novels set in the far, far future of our world. For In Viriconium (1982) Harrison drops almost all elements of heroic fantasy in presenting the story of the artist Ashlyme. Ashlyme's effort to rescue another artist, the reclusive Audsley King, from a plague outbreak is set against the antics of two manic deities.

M. John Harrison - Wikipedia

I want to write a bit here about one of the odder works of an inherently odd subgenre: M. John Harrison's Viriconium sequence. There are four Viriconium books, three novels and a collection of linked short stories: The Pastel City, published in 1971; A Storm of Wings, from 1980; In Viriconium, from 1982; and 1985's Viriconium Nights. One can technically read the books in any order, as few plot strands directly connect them.

In Viriconium, the young men whistle to one another all night long as they go about their deadly games. If you wake suddenly, you might hear footsteps running, or an urgent sigh. After a minute or two, the whistles move away in the direction of the Tinmarket or the Margarethestrass. The next day, some lordling is discovered in the gutter with his throat cut.
